The first pic in the documentation is classic and diagnostic for Cassin's Kingbird.

The first submitter's descriptions of plumage characteristics AND vocalization are consistent with Cassin's Kingbird, but none of the photos submitted, nor any in the Macaulay Library for the Montrose bird, show the white malar joining a white chin. A white malar and chin looks to be the usual case for CAKI in photos from Arizona in the Macaulay Library. Otherwise, the description is appropriate for Cassin's Kingbird, and I vote to accept the record.

Conspicuous bright white malar patch (contrasting sharply with darker gray head & throat) eliminates Western Kingbird and other similar forms (Tropical, Couch's). I vote to accept.

Comments: Great description of the call and enough in the photos to see the relevant field marks (malar, lack of white in the tail, tail shape, etc.) to rule out both Western Kingbird and Tropical/Couch's. Another great state first and what a year for Montrose!

Good photos, clearly establishing the identity of this bird. Call descriptions also fit Cassin's to the exclusion of other possible species.

Clearly a yellow kingbird. Kurylowicz's photo shows the white malar well, and it is strongly hinted at in Hughes's and Babu's photos. The paler tip to the tail is hard to see in the photos, but I think the photos are supportive of that feature. Hughes's remarks about vocalizations are very supportive.
