Record #: 2023-099

Name of bird form: White-faced Ibis

Committee member name: Steve Huggins

Date of review: 1/8/24

Circulation number: 1st

Vote: U-ID

Comments: The two plegadis ibis are both immature birds with seemingly (from photos) dark eyes making it difficult / impossible to differentiate between White faced versus Glossy or increasingly hybrids between the two. The apparent area of pink skin around the lores is interesting and perhaps one could lean towards White-faced.

Comments:

I can detect in several of the photos a reddish tint to the iris, consistent with young White-faced Ibis, as opposed to Glossy Ibis. I am voting to accept this record.

Comments:

I am not aware of any features that can reliably distinguish juvenile/first-winter White-faced from Glossy Ibis.

Comments:

With some reluctance I am voting to accept based on Beau Schaefer's comments about the eye and facial skin color. These do appear to be first year ibis, and with "a bit of red tint around eyes and lores" would either be White-faced or hybrid between White-faced and Glossy. I don't know how we can exclude hybrids. For right now, I'm not going to worry about that.
